$2 00 lithium stock

There's a boom coming in the American lithium industry and there's one and only one play to capture the biggest gains - a $2 lithium mining stock that could deliver triple-digit gains just a short time from now.

As you've likely seen in the news recently, California passed new vehicle requirements that will ban all sales of new gas-powered vehicles by 2035. They've also set a target to be 35% electric by 2026.

They're not the only ones either, with 14 more states proposing similar requirements, including Washington, Oregon, Massachusetts, New York, and New Jersey. The US Department of Energy has even organized a task force to help these states make the switch and has sweetened the pot with incentives for states and consumers alike.

This comes with a subscription to the Foundational Profits newsletter for $199. Included are two bonus reports, 12 monthly issues of the newsletter, 24/7 access to a model portfolio, and more.

Major car manufacturers can't seem to find enough batteries to buy. So many companies, including newcomers to the EV market, like Ford and Jeep, have decided to build their own. Jeep recently partnered with Samsung to build batteries in Indiana.

As another example, Mercedes has just broken ground on a new billion-dollar battery production plant in Bibb County, Alabama. The plant will soon provide batteries for its North American vehicles.

So there is some substance behind the hype here. As is typically the case with early-stage miners, dilution is a concern and Critical Elements doesn't do anything to alleviate these fears. With plenty of options and warrants outstanding.

On the other hand, the company does have seasoned developers and mine operators with experience in de-risking large-scale projects from the point of discovery through to production. A bit of dilution, in this case, may just be the cost of doing business.
